

Medical students across the country are deep into their studies for the year and getting used to the new normal – with most first and second year students either fully virtual or in a hybrid model. Education models, curriculums and courses are being looked at with the understanding that students' education must include new competencies that are better suited to addressing today's health challenges.

But while including this new curriculum and lessons, some schools walk the line – and others cross it – of bringing politics and policy into education.

Where science and research should lead, schools that are funded and led by Big Insurance and Big Government mandate that their policies make decisions. The events and education that BRI brings to medical students are paramount in fighting back against an even more one-sided education being forced on the future of healthcare.

BRI's speakers – physicians, policy-matter experts, and people working in the field – bring real-life knowledge to these students on free-market alternatives to what is being fed to them in the classroom. Our network does what others do not – we don't put money first. BRI's mission demands that the doctor-patient relationship always must come first.

It is more important now than ever that you support BRI's efforts. Our current chapters are thinking of creative ways to generate interest in events in the virtual environment, and BRI funds those efforts. We are continuing our extremely popular Virtual Events Series, started in response to the Covid-19 pandemic. And we continue to grow! We have almost a dozen schools about to become new chapters. But we need your help to continue. Support BRI today.

Michael Cannon of the Cato Institute explains how the estimation doesn't account for underlying law and contracts that would prevent many Americans from losing coverage.

Congress should implement a solution that privileges the interests of patients. Such a fix would give people accurate pricing and coverage information before they receive care—and hold insurers and providers accountable if that information is inaccurate. This is what BRI's Board Chair, Sally Pipes, talks about in Fierce Healthcare.
